Who we are...

The Cross Border Network for Justice and Solidarity includes church, labor, environmental and peace & justice organizations and activists working on both sides of the US/Mexican border for economic justice. We partner with Nuevo Laredo's Center for Workers & Communities (CETRAC). We both believe that globalization should not mean the lowering of our standard-of-living in the U.S. and the exploitation and degradation of workers in Mexico while multinationals pollute communities and pay wages $4 a day in Mexico.

At Ford's Nuevo Laredo plant which makes parts for the U.S. market, the parking lot has far more bicycles than cars.

Mexican Telefonistas - Communications Workers exchange experiences with U.S. autoworkers and a Teamster.

We are seeking to create alternatives to this kind of globalization and working to overcome our history of paternalism and intolerance by building bridges of solidarity and mutual aid between workers and communities of working people. Together we can educate each other and fight for our rights together.

Join us for our next border tour. Fill out the form on the back.

The booming growth of maquiladoras has brought wages of hunger and sickening jobs which leave entire communities in peril. We have seen children of autoworkers who suffering from malnutrition and observed how major U.S. companies use kids under 14 year olds to assemble goods in factories and at home in their cardboard shacks.

Mary Lou at age nine told us how much she wanted to go to the school we were building. Two years later when the school opened, she was already at work in a maquiladora.

Prosperity and social justice are sacrificed at the altar of profit. International competition undercuts U.S. wages, bargaining power, environmental and health and safety standards which took years to win.

Untreated and noxious industrial waste flows directly from industrial parks into the Rio Grande River.

Come to our Franklin Center Dinners for CETRAC. Third Friday of every month 14th & Metropolitan, KCKS
